The Beauty of "Good Enough" Caregiving

When you're juggling a legal career and caregiving for a loved one who is ill, elderly, or has special needs, it's easy to feel like you're falling short. Good news: you don't have to be perfect, just "good enough," to provide meaningful care.

What is "Good Enough Caregiving"?

- Your loved one needs consistent, reliable care — not perfection.
- Your job is to meet their essential needs while maintaining your own well-being.

It's Normal to Struggle

- Caregiving is hard, and, unlike parenthood, it's almost always unexpected.
- Struggling doesn't mean you're failing.

Managing Expectations

- You can't do everything.
- Focus on what your loved one needs rather than what you want to do for them.

Redefining Success

- Celebrate small wins and moments of connection.
- Practical Exercise: End each day by noting one caregiving win, no matter how small.

"Forbidden Feelings" are Normal

- It's normal to feel frustration or rage — even to wish your loved one were gone.
- These feelings don't make you a bad caregiver. They make you human.

Be Kind to Yourself

- Practice self-compassion.
- Remember that struggles and mistakes are part of caregiving.
- Practical Exercise: Write a short letter to yourself, as if you were comforting a friend.
